Neglected Relative to Negative Emotions Relative to the negative emotions, positive emotions have received little empirical attention. Then comes cognitive emancipation, when the child elaborates a picture of the world that is his or her. Who does it and how do they do it?

Exaggerated love of learning shows itself as know-it-all-ism or to be pedantic. Studies of twins suggest that the jobs we take, the kind of partner we marry, our political preferences, even the names we give our pets, are all substantially determined by genetic heritage. Even though they enable a person to transcend any given situation and to adjust to his or her life world at large, they tie one down to the facticity of this life-world and its anticipated development.

Journal of Psychology and Christianity, 21, -- Many psychologists mention animals, however, humans are able to put their activities into the context of their life-world, rather than just into the actual situation; they are determined by the world at large rather than by the environment. What currently appear to be contradictions should serve as useful indications of alternative routes to the future.
