In addition to exploring sustainability in the spaces of the developed, developing and post-socialist worlds, this book also considers the role of geographical scale within this newly emerging society, and critically analyzes the ways in which contemporary strategies for sustainable development are responding to the complex global, national, regional, and local processes, which will ultimately determine how sustainable our societies are.

Furthermore, throughout the book he synthesizes a diverse collection of Sustainable Region 7. Combining case study material on urban health movements in Poland, agricultural practices in India, environmental legislation in the USA, and ecological planning in the Arctic amongst others, Spaces of Sustainability considers the opportunities and barriers which exist to sustainable development within different parts of the world.
