Description in the Age of the Encyclopedia Ithaca: The spirit of gallantry means saying flattering things in an agreeable manner.

Hence the dead have the honor of tears that were never shed for the living. However rare true love may be, true love is even rarer. Of all the violent passions the one that befits a woman best is love.

Thus it ultimately happens that having despised death when they were ignorant there is always this difference, that the contempt the peer shows for death is but the love of fame which hides death from his sight; in the peasant it is but the result of his limited vision that hides from him the extent of the evil, and leaves him free to reflect on other things. No matter how suspicious we are of those who speak to us, we always believe that they speak more truthfully to us than to .
