Aretino was prepared to do this with his own works. But Aretino also used praise of the powerful as a means of self-advancement, and in the fashionable Roman press of Ludovico degli Arrighi brought out two editions of poems by him in praise of Pope Clement VII and his datary, Gian Matteo Giberti. At the end of the dream of Parnassus which he describes in a letter of he is offered various poetic crowns but refuses them all in favour of 'a privilege by virtue of which I can sell or pawn the talent which the heavens have showered upon me'.

The letter of 22 Juneto Marcolini, already quoted, has to be treated with caution. Hewas of obscure birth, the son of a cobbler, and, though he too came to converse I came a marked change of tactics. Francesco Marcolini brought out Aretino's first two books of letters, but because the printer was absent from Venice, Aretino had to turn elsewhere for the printing of the third book, explaining that he 'could not live without eating'.
